

Greg Clark, Ph.D.

Greg Clark has more than 25 years of experience focused on helping leaders and teams develop and succeed. He has held leadership roles in human resource and organizational development, in addition to experience in business development, sales, and teaching at the university level. As an executive coach and team development consultant, he has been effective in helping organizations and leaders meet the many challenges that they face.

Clark has been particularly successful in helping leaders succeed in balancing the development of their organizations while effectively managing their own careers. His own successes and challenges in leading and managing others have provided Clark a healthy respect for both the individuals who choose the path of leader and the critical nature that role plays in the success of any organization.

Clark uses a coaching process that is based on clear, desired outcomes for the coaching engagement, gathering relevant feedback, and having clear outcomes and accountability for both the client and the coach. His specialty areas include high-potential leadership development, leadership challenges involving direct reports and teams, and helping leaders with excellent functional skills (e.g., sales, operations, finance) to evolve their focus to organizational leadership.

Clark's client makeup reflects the rapidly changing demographics of today's global work force, with numerous opportunities to travel and work with individuals in the Americas, Europe, Asia, and the Mideast. Clark has provided coaching to more than 1,000 individuals and has facilitated more than 400 team development sessions.